men go back there to be groping them. [137] Cheves states that the responsibility for people in the backroom is to gently push an unwanted hand away from their bodies. [137] Rennie McDougall in Discussing Consent in Gay Spaces requires nuanced, non-sex panic, and states that modern consent approaches to gay spaces such as gay bars and saunas are negative sexual interactions with gay men, as a stranger's non-consens consensated but non-threatening hands are the gay men. [138] Jo Jackson says that in the strange female community, she had experiences where the participants of the scene touched her body (near her thigh) and breasts without her consent, but she didn't say anything because she felt that these actions were part of a soft charade of seduction. [139] She claims that the strange female community is butt-grabbing, dudeish remarks, and aggressive, enduring come-ons, and says it makes sense to be aggressive or use sexual energy to wield power... Hot. [139] She says some women feel a sense of entitlement to tap to blur the concept of consent. Another issue is that strange women often grow up just exposed to media portrayals of heterosexual dating, so young strange women don't have the vocabulary of women-on-women dating and understanding social cues for consent. [139] Jordan Bosiljevac argues in Why can't I report no that yes doesn't necessarily mean consent to ... poor, disabled, strange, non-white, trans, or feminine people: claims that consent approaches are a kind of privilege created for well-healed, hetero, ster, white, full-bodied people. [140] According to an article about gay students at McGill University, there is no actively scenario such as heterosexual sex and strange sex in strange sexual encounters, but rather revealing, as such, there is more discussion about consent between strange partners about every step and act. [141] Rebecca Kahn, however, states that in strange encounters where a person is not and a person is trans, the cis person may have more power in the relationship, which is the trans person ... feelings of fear, or subtly ... the desire to please the more privileged partner in the encounter; Kahn says that to deal with these differences in power, the privileged partner must make sure that the marginalized person has a good time, letting them know that consent is not assumed. [141] Asexual people may feel that they have consent to sex when they are in a relationship. [142] References ^ a b c d Roffee, James A. (2015). If that's a yes, it actually means yes. Such arguments make it clear that when it comes to the language of attack, it should not be generalized. The odd hand on our asses at a gay club, as Henry writes, isn't necessarily sexual assault. Grouping the two ends of a spectrum into one category of attack makes the seriousness of aggressive actions trivial and ignores the fact that unexpected—but not threatening—encounters are a positive part of sexual discovery ^ a b c Jackson, Jo (2018).
